New York, Sept. 20.—The market advanced to 10 and 11 points over yesterday's in the last hour or covering of shorts and better trade demand, with little selling pressure. This advance was well held up to the close, owing to light outside selling pressure and continued firm spot markets.

Square 1747—Lots 32 and 33; Mary J. Beall to H. D. and fearlessly along the gently sloping eled twice as fast when he was only accompanied by indisepensable servants. Some curious old documents have been preserved in which the official who arranged for the King's comfort on his travels explains to the provincial dignitaries what they are to put on his majesty's table and how they had better house him.

"As to the royal table, he wrkes, "see that you get first of all some fresh-water fish and shellfish, of which his majesty is particularly fond. Also some meats. Then there should be some good old hock, but also some brandy and light beer. If possible his majesty always takes his midday meal in a barn, a tent, or a garden house, where there is plenty of air, and likewise his majesty prefers to sleep in a barn or garden house because he does not like warm rooms, nor can he walk up steep steps without discomfort." This frugal King's greater son, Frederick II, inherited some of his father's simple tastes, and always preferred when traveling in his own dominions to put up in country parsonages and in rooms with only a bed, an armchair, and a table. But parsimonious though he was in general, he paid the sum of £15 a night for these humble quarters, and he tried to save expenses by taking with him only the absolutely indispensable servants and one other carriage besides that old coach of his, the repairs of which he never would pay during the whole of his reign, so that when it was falling to pieces it had to be patched up in secret and the expense had to be covered somehow without the King's knowledge. His own carriage was drawn by twelve horses, and that of the attendants-chief among whom was the man in charge of a bagful of gold-by six.
